In a decision dated 22nd February 2000, the Conseil de la concurrence ruled on a referral by the Fédération française des importateurs de fruits et légumes (French Federation of Fruit and vegetable Importers), which had lodged a complaint regarding actions undertaken by groups of strawberry producers.

In 1993, the Coordination rurale du Lot-et-Garonne (Lot-et-Garonne Rural Co-ordination Organisation) had exerted pressure on fruit and vegetable traders, in an effort to deter them from acquiring supplies of strawberries from Spain.

It had organised boycott action against imports of Spanish strawberries, by carrying out checks on merchandise in warehouses and shops, and by threatening to destroy merchandise. It had also circulated letters addressed to distributors, in which it fixed a minimum retail price for French strawberries, and pressure was exerted on distributors who chose not to respect the price directives. These initiatives took place within a context characterised by violent action taken against Spanish imports and several shops.

In its decision, the Conseil observed that the actions undertaken by the Coordination rurale, during the crucial period when the price of French strawberries is much higher than that of strawberries imported from Spain, had the principal result of obstructing the free determination of prices for a consumer product by market forces.

The Conseil found that by imposing retail prices and boycotting imports, the Coordination rurale du Lot-et-Garonne had obstructed price drops, prevented other companies from accessing the market and acutely restricted trade between Member States of the European Union. Consequently, the Conseil fined the organisation a total of 150,000 FF.
